“A thread is very small and very thin. We don’t notice it when it accompanies us every morning. With it, we build the softest of blankets for winter. With it, skilful hands assemble tapestries of memories. Thousands of threads must come together to dress or cover us. But sometimes, the thread no longer wants company. It sets off alone to trace a beautiful route. It becomes a line; it travels the world. Proudly, we watch it drift away, following the shapes of a river, taking the curves of a tree, or drawing – even – the engine of a ship. Yet, the thread never forgets us. Come to look closely: it keeps expanding from its starting point. It whispers possible paths. It guides us through the labyrinth, by stretching out its hand.”
